Forming our founder

Father McGivney's seminary formation in Baltimore helped him to respond to the needs of his time

Michael McGivney was preparing for final exams at a Jesuit-run seminary in Montreal when he heard the tragic news. His father, Patrick, had died suddenly at age 48. A few months later, after ensuring his family's financial security, McGivney received support from his bishop to continue his priestly formation. He did not, however, return to Sainte-Marie College in Montreal. Instead, in what proved to be a decisive turning point, he began studies at a different St. Mary's – a Sulpician-run seminary in the bustling port city of Baltimore. READ MORE

The McGivney letters

The surviving writings of the Knights' founder show a pastor determined to meet the needs of his people and the vision behind the Knights of Columbus

Just 13 letters and a few quotes recorded by the local newspapers – that is what remains of all the words written and spoken by Father McGivney across his 38 years. Much of what we know about him comes from the testimonies of people who knew him, but what do his own words tell us?

Some of his letters are of a kind that priests write routinely, such as a recommendation to his bishop on behalf of a young man discerning a religious vocation. But more than half of the letters chart the earliest days of the Knights of Columbus – the spiritual vision behind it, as well as its practical workings and the initial challenges it faced.
